
The Journal of Urgent Writing

The Journal of Urgent Writing

Volume 2

2017

MASSEY UNIVERSITY PRESS

Introduction

Simon Wilson 6

I saw the mountain erupt

Morgan Godfery 10

At the heart of it

Jess Berentson-Shaw 28

New radicals

Simon Wilson 46

Moon landings

Sarah Laing 62

Scenic potential

Conor Clarke

Melino stood at the edge

Teena Brown Pulu 66

The root of it all

Carys Goodwin 82

Trump's wall

Tim Watkin 100

We're all Māori now

Emma Espiner 116

A time. A place.Three songs

Maria Majsja 130

The path not yet travelled

Raf Manji 140

The fruit shop

Gilbert Wong 154

tents

Cont

The long shadow

Māmari Stephens 166

The open society
and its friends

David Cohen 178

Fa’afetai tele lava,
James Baldwin

Victor Rodger 194

The politics of disengagement

Sylvia Nissen 204

The things I used to say

Andrew Judd 220

Damn the dams

Mike Joy and
Kyleisha Foote 236

Critic and conscience

Giselle Byrnes 254

The art of dreaming

Max Harris 268

How to die

Jo Randerson 284

About the contributors

298

So ver

U

y

Introduction

Simon Wilson

urgent

James Baldwin, whose friends Malcolm X, Martin Luther King and Medgar Evers were all gunned down around him, once declared that he was an optimist because he was a human being. Victor Rodger writes in this collection about the inspiration he took from Baldwin, gay, black, a writer — and, he implies, someone who gave him a liberating permission to be something else: angry.

Anger's what happens when you realise there is no good reason for things to be as bad as they are. It gives you urgency and it gives you voice. You can hear it in this book in the essay by Teena Brown Pulu, an account of the aftermath of a bus crash in Gisborne. And in Mike Joy and Kyleisha Foote's record of the damage caused by dams, Carys Goodwin's discovery of cultural imperialism in the climate change movement, Andrew Judd's tale of the racist within.

Maria Majsa, Gilbert Wong and Morgan Godfery, meanwhile, present their own childhoods, each of them made urgent by the complexities of history and identity. Things are more than what they seem. That theme also emerges in Conor Clarke's formally beautiful yet whimsical photo essay, Sylvia Nissen's inquiry into the political views of young people, and Jess Berentson-Shaw's interrogation of welfare philosophy.

Māmari Stephens asks some tough questions about the future of marae and Giselle Byrnes does the same for universities. Sarah Laing muses on activism, mooncups and friendship, while David Cohen recalls an historical moment rich in intellectual stimulation and immigrant contribution.

Perhaps it's some heady mix of Baldwinian optimism and anger, but many of the writers here believe we are poised on the edge of something big. Jo Randerson is ready for it, in a radically personal way. Raf Manji is gearing up, Tim Watkin has some cautionary advice, and Max Harris wants us to keep our heads up, so to speak. Emma Espiner and I both propose new ways to do things, and hers is so utterly sensible it could be the making of us all.